History of Genocide

In 1948, the United Nations passed the Genocide Convention, which defined genocide as the intentional destruction of a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group. The Convention was the first time that such acts were considered crimes under international law. The genocide in Rwanda was a clear violation of this convention. The Rwandan government, led by Paul Kagame, targeted the Hutu population, who were the majority in the country. The genocide was carried out through various means, including mass shootings, bombings, and the use of machetes. The death toll is estimated to be between 500,000 and 1 million people.

The Rwandan genocide was a result of a long history of ethnic tension between the Hutu and Tutsi populations. The Tutsi had been a minority in Rwanda since the colonial era, and they were often treated as a privileged class. The Hutu, on the other hand, were the majority but were often discriminated against. This tension was exacerbated by the Belgian colonial administration, which favored the Tutsi. After Rwanda gained independence in 1962, the Hutu majority government was established, but the ethnic tensions remained. The genocide in 1994 was a culmination of these tensions.

The Rwandan genocide was also a result of the power vacuum created by the death of King Ntare Rwisirika in 1986. The king was a Hutu, and his death led to a power struggle between the Hutu and Tutsi. The Tutsi-led government, led by Yvonne Habyarimana, was overthrown in 1990 by the Hutu-led Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF). The RPF was a Tutsi-led militia that had been fighting for the return of Tutsi power. The genocide in 1994 was a result of the RPF's victory, which led to the extermination of the Tutsi population.
